

Our model shelter is designed for three water supplies. It has a gravity fed spring, a ground water well, and the individual water containers. Even if it also had a large attached water tank, it would still need those individual containers.

Pipes to water reservoirs can break, reservoirs can break, wells and springs can go dry and water courses can change direction, but those individual water containers will still be in the shelter.

Suppose you have no shelter in which to put the water containers? Everyone has some sort of shelter or potential shelter. That is part of the message in Nuclear War Survival Skills. Even if the best you could do would be to throw together a core fallout shelter in your house with a radiation protection factor of about 10 or so, that might still save your life — if you have water. You can go without food for 30 days, but not without water.

If you have not already done so, you should immediately store, in five gallon or smaller containers, about 15 gallons of water for each person who may depend upon your preparations. Put in a little chlorine bleach in accordance with the instructions in Nuclear War Survival Skills.

You don't think chlorine is good to drink? Fine. Store it that way anyway. You can do it quickly and then replace it with fancier water later if you get around to it. The chlorine won't kill you immediately — dehydration will.

FIGHTING CHANCE COMMERCIAL POLICY

Fighting Chance is a non-profit project supported primarily by donations and also by sales of newsletters, books, video tapes, and other informational items such as the shelter plans. Our principle costs are for printing, postage, and production of informational materials.

We do not directly or indirectly sell any civil defense products other than information. We usually buy samples of the products we recommend, but we pay the same price as everyone else and receive no royalties or other payments from the suppliers.

We are receiving an increasing number of commercial offers regarding our mailing list, product recommendations, and sales opportunities. As strong advocates of free enterprise, we are pleased by these offers and do our best to help commercial interests — just as we help private individuals.
